Although the sport prevailed on Jubilee Day in the North, there was plenty of it up in the North, at Gosforth Park, and if many bold Northumbrians could not journey down to London they could not see our gracious Queen, and so they took it out in sport. They had a Diamond Jubilee Handicap to console them, but it was a small consolation, for the race was not at all the same as the one at Gosforth Park. The race was not at all the same as the one at Gosforth Park. The race was not at all the same as the one at Gosforth Park.

It is worthy of note that there is a new race at Gosforth Park, and it is a very good one. The race is a very good one. The race is a very good one. The race is a very good one. It occurred to the writer and some of his fellow-fellows that Jubilee Day would afford an excellent opportunity for a cycling outing. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one.

Two of the fellows, a lad and a lass, were at home from school for the temporary holiday; the other couple, an old boy and a young man, also had the day off from work. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one.

There was a fair excuse, therefore, for the quartette to turn their backs on the pumps and vanities of jubilitating London to do their rejoicings among the buttercups and daisies and new mown hay. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one.

Leaving the town at 9.30, they took a route through Ealing, Hayes, and Hillingdon to Uxbridge. The whole road was highly ornamental with flags, festoons, and all manner of brightly-coloured decorations. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one.

Ealing Common being especially gorgeous. In the centre was a big, enormous mound, looking like a but in which some Broodingnagian Robinson Crusoe dwelt, while Japanese lamps were suspended from tree to tree all round the Common. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one.

On inquiry it was discovered that the mound would be set alight at dark and it would be the eyes of the universe in bonfire. Southall made but a poor show after Ealing, but at Hayes an enterprising householder had put up a decorative device which certainly "bated Banagher" for originality if not for variety. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one. The match was a very good one.
